Research Guide

INTRODUCTION

Information about jury verdicts, bench trial judgments and settlements in personal injury cases is important for a variety of reasons. Award or settlement amounts and the facts surrounding these cases are helpful in evaluating how a case may fare at trial and may be used as a bargaining tool in settlement negotiations.

Personal injury verdict and settlement information can be found in both print and electronic formats. Each source supplies different details about the cases; some give only the bare minimum of information, including the type of case, jurisdiction and the award or settlement amount. Other sources may also provide citations to statutes, case name, judge's name, docket number, statement of the facts, award or settlement amount, appellate information and experts used. Most of these resources require either subscription or membership but most law libraries provide access to a variety of these publications.

Almost all publishers accept verdict and settlement information submitted by the attorneys involved in the cases. In addition, many legal publishers hire individuals to go to local courthouses, retrieve court files and read, summarize and submit the cases. Other legal publishers gather information from reported appellate court opinions.

Jury verdicts and bench trial judgments are generally easier to locate than settlements because the verdict or judgment amount is part of the court file. Settlements tend to be confidential in nature. Even if the settlements are not confidential, it is still difficult in many jurisdictions to find actual dollar amounts because the court files generally don't include that information.

Listed below are some of the national and Washington-specific sources for personal injury verdicts and settlements. Some also include employment cases. If it is available online, that information is also provided.
